

"Most likely to" questions are questions that friends ask one another. They learn about their likes, dislikes, and play it as a small party game. Friends gather together in a small group, prompt the "most likely to" questions to each other, and then each player must respond with their answer.

Answers should contain mutual friends. Or the names of people who the group is familiar with. It can include celebrities. These conversation starters are great for friends who want to have a fun evening together. To play, simply print out the list of questions below. And prompt your friends with one question at a time. Be sure to answer quickly so no one has to wait around for the other player to think something up. Question game.
